Greenpeace condemned by its original founder as 'evil' and being guilty of 'losing its humanitarian roots'

- Co-founder Patrick Moore says organisation doesn't care about people
- He cites example of a GM-rice which would help millions if widely produced
- Dr Moore says fact that Greenpeace oppose crop shows it is 'evil'
- Comes after the ecologist quit the group because it became 'too political'
- Greenpeace scientist insists it does care about 'social and economic issues'

Greenpeace has been branded an 'evil organisation' which has 'lost concern for humans' in an astonishing attack by its own co-founder.

Ecologist Dr Patrick Moore, who quit Greenpeace in 1986, has launched a scathing criticism of the activist group, which he insisted has lost its humanitarian roots.

His attack on the organisation he helped create comes as former Environment Secretary Owen Paterson campaigns against the 'self-serving' and 'highly-paid' network of environmental pressure groups he calls the 'green blob'.

Dr Moore told BBC Radio 4's Today Programme: 'My problem with Greenpeace is they have lost any humanitarian roots they had.'

'When we started Greenpeace it was to stop nuclear war and the destruction of human civilisation, that of course is the "peace" in Greenpeace.'

'The "green" is the environment and that's good as well, but they lost the concerns for humans... They have turned, basically, into an evil organisation.'

He gave the example of so-called 'golden rice', a crop enriched with vitamin A which supporters say would help millions of the world's poorest people improve their diet.

Dr Moore said the fact that Greenpeace opposed the idea showed that they no longer care about people.

Dr Moore helped found Greenpeace in 1971 while PhD student in ecology, but he later left the group, claiming it had become more interested in politics than science.

Dr Patrick Moore has launched a scathing attack on Greenpeace, the organisation he helped co-found in the 1970s, saying it has become 'evil'

He is now a proponent of nuclear energy and is sceptical about sole human responsibility for climate change.

Dr Doug Parr, chief scientist at Greenpeace, later shrugged of the criticisms made of his organisation.

He said: 'When we do campaigns, we look at influence, we look at impact and we are very, very mindful to incorporate social and economic issues into what we do, because otherwise campaigns won't work.'

+3

A representative of Greenpeace has said the organisation always considers the social effects of its campaigns

'There's not going to be some kind of green dictatorship which imposes these decisions on anybody.'

The row comes after Pascal Husting, Greenpeace International's Programme Director, was exposed earlier this year as having commuted the 250 miles between Luxembourg and Amsterdam by plane since 2012.

Each trip is believed to have cost Greenpeace £200 and would have generated 142kg of carbon dioxide emissions, it was said.

Dr Parr said Mr Husting's behaviour was 'a mistake' and 'should never have happened'.

On the organisation's position of golden rice, he said: 'The thing about golden rice is it's a least-favourable option and it doesn't actually exist yet, it's been many years in proposal and... it doesn't work'

Greenpeace is little more than a crime syndicate. They trespass on private property, they destroy and vandalise private property, and ruin scientific work being done for humanity. It's always fun to enter a debate with their young, spotty and naive money collectors on a street corner!

Moore was never a founder and he's since gone on to build his "career" on this falsehood. If you don't like Greenpeace that's fine, but making your life's work about criticizing them is just sad.

You lie. Dr. Moore WAS a founder. Denials from Greenpeace are a desperate, craven, hypocritical attempt to defend themselves against criticism from a respected scientist.

How can a non-violent organization that only attempts to help people and the environment be evil? Considering the real evil done today, I suggest that it is those who are saying this who are acting in a evil way.

Dr Patrick Moore is not the founder of Greenpeace. If you check their website they have a copy of Dr Patrick's Moore's application form, which proves that he didn't even apply for membership until after the organization started. In addition for the last 28 years, Dr Patrick Moore has made his living by supporting the companies he used to protest against, playing on his supposed Greenpeace credentials.

Dr. Moore played a major role - possibly the most important role - in the very earliest days of Greenpeace in getting it organised, bringing it to public recognition and generating a sound scientific ethical basis for its activities. He left when some of those who joined later started using pseudo-science to justify attention-grabbing activities, just for the sake of publicity - characteristic of Greenpeace today. He is, and was, the founder of the original Greenpeace environmental goals.

The Daily Mail should get its facts right. Dr Patrick Moore WAS NOT one of the original founders of Greenpeace, but an early member and a right troublemaker. He is no genuine environmentalist but a paid stooge for industry and other vested business interests. He is taking his 30 pieces of silver each day .
