Wish Lists Coming Out, and Not for Christmas

Friday, 30 September 2011

It must be election season.

A number of groups are chiming in on what they think ought to be key issues for this November's election.

The Canadian Cancer Society wants political parties to pay more attention to cancer prevention, including policies on indoor tanning, pesticides, and tobacco use.

Meanwhile, the Saskatchewan Government Employees Union went as far as to call the Sask Party 'out of touch with reality' when it comes to funding for the Ministry of Social Services. They're calling for a review of how the government handles their dealings with vulnerable children and families.

And workers in Community-based Organizations, represented by a coalition of the S-G-E-U, CUPE and the S-E-I-U, say they're looking for candidates willing to address what they're calling chronic under-funding.

The coalition says their workers are earning 4 to 7 dollars per hour less than public-sector employees in the same jobs.
